THE ORACLE OF RASPUTIN

PRAISE FOR THIS BOOK

“An excellent translation into English, the Oracle of Rasputin flows very well, and considering the unorthodoxy of Rasputin and the historic intrigue involved it is certainly an interesting read. But the most striking is that it reaches into the heart of mysticism and ancient wisdom. It is most revealing.”

— A.O. Kime, editor of Matrix Book Store, author of *Metaphysical Cavemen:
A Refreshing New Look at Ancient History*

“The Oracle is a fascinating read. Professor Manteia has put together a lively chronicle of the mystic/starets/psychic/faith healer Rasputin, and has also given us Rasputin’s personal amulets/talismans to easily divine our own destiny.

“Rasputin was murdered in 1916 Russia by those who feared his surreal magical powers. It took mega doses of cyanide, 5 bullets, severe clubbing and drowning to succeed. Long after being buried, removed and burned, legend has it that his dead body actually sat up in the flames horrifying all onlookers.

“Clearly Rasputin was amazing in so many ways, and the fact that we can now use his personal magic amulets today, which were given to and translated by Professor Manteia, is truly exceptional. It’s one of a kind. A must have book for those who desire to foretell their future.”

— Jeri Trannett DeTillio,

A TRUE STORY IN A VEIL OF LEGEND

Riccione (Italy), September 1952. The long hot summer that steamed the magnificent Adriatic beach was ending, and it was enchanting to relax in this quiet and serene atmosphere.

The well-known beach resort was going through its usual end-of-season closing activities. The families that had made the beach so alive just a few weeks before had returned to their homes, and the variegated sound of Italian dialects was replaced by the Germanic and Scandinavian accents of the vacationers from these countries who used to come to Riccione at the very beginning or the very end of the season.

The beach lifeguards, with their wives and children, were beginning to disassemble the sun cabanas and tents, and to remove the parasols and deck chairs, commenting on the financial results of the season in their typical Romagna dialect.

The coastline now looked undressed from all the summer colorful furniture, stiff and formal, but at the same time very peaceful. Among the very few vacationers enjoying the last days of the season, was a well-known and respected chiromancer (palmist), who—during the summer—moved his office to Riccione, from his home town.

That was a very busy summer for him, with many clients, and many palms to read and study. Yes, study, because “Manteia”—this was the pseudonym of the chiromancer—had a very professional working approach, which made him very much admired in the resort of Riccione. During these last days of the season, Manteia was trying to get his well-deserved vacation.

Chiromancy, the way he performed it, was a strenuous and stressful job. His efforts to remain alone were not really successful though, as friends, clients or simply neighborhood hotel and restaurant keepers wanted to see him, with the excuse of congratulating him, but in reality because they all needed some extra help, a special “response” maybe, or simply advice regarding business or family matters.

One of those evenings Manteia reluctantly accepted the invitation from a group of clients/friends to have dinner in a local restaurant. At appetizers, nine persons were seated at the dinner table, but by coffee time a small crowd of local acquaintances was gathering around the dinner table. Dinners usually end up with conversations, and Italians like to discuss a variety of matters, mixing jokes with more serious issues, where all participants have something to say.

Because of the presence of Manteia, the favorite discussion of the evening was “occultism and divination,” and the crowd was split between the people who just want to know more and those that consider themselves “logical and rational,” and are in fact basically skeptical.

At the moment attention was focused on a controversial and complex issue: should one consider “true” or “false” the innate powers of divination typical of “supernatural” individuals? The discussion became very emotional, and disparate and divergent opinions were expressed. Several historic and legendary personalities were mentioned: Apollonius, King Solomon, Paracelsus, the Admirable Doctor Bacon, Pico della Mirandola, Joan of Arc, Nostradamus, the Count of Cagliostro ... and suddenly another famous name was mentioned: Rasputin, the Russian monk. Some of the most argumentative skeptics among the crowd indicated Rasputin as a strange individual, a swindling mind, a diabolic hypnotist.

This superficial analysis provoked the reaction of Manteia who—passionately—defended the mysterious and obscure Russian starets (a spiritual adviser in the Eastern Orthodox Church). The quiet chiromancer, who during dinner rarely spoke and was the unintentional cause of the dispute, was suddenly shaken by the argument and spoke out with unexpected energy. Showing an in-depth knowledge of the legendary Russian, Manteia described his life and works from an historical point of view, as well as from the angle of a divination scholar who sympathizes with a fellow human. It was a passionate defense and an analytical, honest review of Rasputin's personality.

He outlined the good and bad of the paradoxical Siberian, within the scenario of the decline of the Romanov's empire. Manteia's reaction seemed to end the dispute, when someone, one the most skeptical and aggressive, ironically said: "You future-tellers are very smart people. You can talk about the past and predict the future of your clients, because you know in advance certain details related to their life and personality."

"We are not future-tellers," replied Manteia. "We read and study according to the scientific method of chiromancy the lines of the hands and then give the interpretations written in those lines since birth."

"Yes, but also the appearance of the person can help you," insisted the skeptic. "For instance it is easy to say, for example, that Peter has always been a waiter." He emphatically indicated one of the waiters in the restaurant. Everyone looked in that direction and somebody laughed for what was considered a good joke. Peter, an aged waiter, very serious and polite, stopped for a minute, surprised at becoming the center of attention. Then, in a very humble and respectful way, came closer to the table, whispering in a low tone of voice, "May I?"

He then opened his palms searching for the eyes of Manteia, in the characteristic gesture of one who wants the chiromancer to read them. Suddenly the room was silent and filled with anticipation. Manteia looked with great attention at these open palms, in his own personal manner, studying their lines in detail. Then, calmly and professionally, he started to speak. "The form and the lines of these hands clearly tells that appearances can be misleading. Here we have a classic case. Form and lines of these hands show that this person has excellent breeding, and has an above average education. According to the chiromantic interpretation we are in front of a person who has a college degree, possibly a Ph.D., and has taught in University Colleges many years ago, in a far away country. Unfortunate events have caused this person to change what was the natural way of his life ...” Slowly Peter closed his hands and very politely said: “Thank you, you are correct ... please stop.” Those present were astonished. Somebody tried to convince Peter to say more, but he excused himself and discreetly moved back to the service area. People were kept until late night with the most diverse comments. Each of those present was giving his own opinion and personal impression of what he saw. The aggressive skeptical guy, who had provoked the scene, remained speechless.

The sun was rising when the participants to that unusual dinner started to separate and return to their homes.

A few days later, Manteia was resting on a deck chair in front of the beach. It was a beautiful sunny day with a clear sky and he was enjoying it all. Suddenly, he felt a light touch on his shoulder. It was Peter, the waiter. “Excuse me, sir, can I have a word with you?” And, without waiting for the reply, Peter started to talk, slowly at first, and then at an increasing tempo, with a sort of unusual tone of voice. Manteia understood immediately that he needed to get rid of an interior and personal revilement, and was not surprised of the confidence Peter had in him, as this was normal in his daily working routine. Still, he understood that he was going to listen to an extraordinary story. Peter, the enigmatic waiter, told the story of his life. He often burst out with emotional and variegated details. He was in reality a Ph.D. in Linguistics and Physics. In extremely humble words he stated he had been a Professor at the university of an important college city in Russia in 1917. Unfortunately it was for only two years, while the tragic circumstances of those days ravaged and destroyed his family.

He was only 28 when he witnessed the distress and affliction caused by the Bolshevik revolution in his native land. He escaped to France where he met the daughter of Italian immigrants and married her. He worked all sorts of manual jobs, and never tried to go back to his professional career, which he hated. For him it was the cause of his misfortune, misery and bitterness. He and his wife moved to Italy, where he naturalized and worked as a waiter. Already aged, he was accepting seasonal jobs and was working in Riccione thanks to his fluency in foreign languages. Now that the season was over, he hoped to get other employment on the French

Riviera.

Peter was a tired and hopeless human being, waiting for death to end his sufferings, but continuing with dignity to face his daily task. He confessed to Manteia, who was listening with attention and understanding, his emotion on hearing the passionate defense of the Russian monk, Grigori Rasputin. Peter met Rasputin in 1916, the year of his death, when he was still the “omnipotent Rasputin,” a few months before being killed by jealous courtesans.

Peter, moved by gratitude for the words that Manteia spent in defense of Rasputin, wanted to show him the generosity of the authentic son of Russia, by sharing with him secrets kept for more than 35 years. He told Manteia that his father Yosif was one of the last secretaries of Rasputin. The Russian starets had great esteem and consideration for Yosif, and this proved fatal to him. Three days after Rasputin’s death, Yosif was found hanged in a wood. Peter’s mother, destroyed by pain and terror, joined her husband two months later.

Now the old man was silent. The story was told and the excitement over. His eyes were lightless and somber. Manteia was now looking at the “real” Peter, a piece of refuse, crushed by desperate memories. He vigorously shook the cold hands of Peter, his new friend, in an overpowering and simple gesture of brotherly love. Peter remained silent a few minutes more and then, slowly and solemnly, drew from his jacket a voluminous manuscript scroll. “Keep it,” said Peter. “You deserve it, because you respect and admire our Grigori. So keep it. This is the manuscript of an Oracle that Rasputin dictated to my father ... to be printed in intelligible form. The Oracle was supposed to be a present for our Czarina Alexandra. Make use of it in a way you think more appropriate.” Manteia, now moved and astonished, whispered, “Thank you ...” Peter, handing him the scroll, said, “Addio, A Dieu,” then walked slowly along the waterfront, waving his right hand indefinitely. “Arrivederci ...”

Manteia could not say anymore.

THE ORACLE

THE DISCOVERY OF THE ORACLE

After pondering a while, Manteia finally opened the scroll. It contained several handwritten pages and mysterious drawings; the calligraphy looked antique, large and irregular, and the drawing far from perfect. Manteia read rapidly through the documents and understood, or better intuitively “felt,” what it dealt with. The document contained a sort of predictive method already partially known to him under a different format. The graphics, although incomplete and sometimes similar to hieroglyphics, were probably the easiest part. Most difficult was interpreting the writings, which were in an approximate French, interposed with sentences of unknown meaning in Russian. Some sheets were eroded by age, others worn out by coarse and rough corrections. Translating, interpreting and assembling the documents required time, effort, and great patience and determination. A person inexperienced in occultism and divination would have certainly failed. Manteia, using not only his professional know-how, but a tenacious character as well, was able to finish the task in a little more than two years of work. It was a job that made him feel like a medieval scribe. The final result was worth the effort.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD “ORACLE”

The etymology of the word “Oracle” means “Response.” Famous were the Oracles of Ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome. In those times, people from every country believed that the “Oracles” reflected the inclination of the gods. Oracles were consulted by citizens of all social classes to obtain responses regarding important business as well as common domestic situations. The pagan ministers used to “talk” to their gods via female mediums in a long and complex preparation. The medium received the “response” from the god and passed it to the minister, who then told the believers. If the “response” was favorable, then the reaction was enthusiastic, as the believer saw god being on his side. Contrarily the negative “response” was followed by total faith and no sign of protest or grievance. Oracles became popular and plentiful. Among the most famous: Apollo, Jupiter, Ammon, Trophonius, Amphisarius, Delos, with a special mark for Delphi, Olympia, Circes, Minerva and Vesta. Less known were Samos, Juno, Bacchus, Demeter and Chora. Pythonesses and Sibyls engaged strenuous competitions in creating prophetic works such as the “Book of Destiny” and “The Sibyllic Texts” of the Marcii brothers. The latter focused on Government Acts and Decisions. Examples are abundant. Homer reported that Odysseus evoked the spirits of Avernus and that Cassandra predicted the fall of Troy. Virgil wrote about Aeneas descending with the Sibyl of Cumae to Hades, where his father Anchises showed him his future descendants waiting to reach Earth. The ancient people of Egypt, Greece and Rome left magnificent monuments and temples to witness their trust in the gods and in the oracles. Other great ancient civilizations, China, Persia and India, did the same. In studying the document obtained by Peter, Manteia was able to grasp the methodologies that inspired Rasputin in the creation of his Oracle.

THE KABBALAH

This word is from the Hebrew qabbala, meaning received doctrine or tradition, from qibbel, to receive. It can also be spelled cabala, cabbala or kabala. The wise Rabbis used kabbalah as an interpretation system for key passages of the Bible, with a combination of characters and words. With the help of the kabbalistic science certain chapters of the “Book” were explained and disseminated to the new generations in a dualistic form: one literal and clear, the second symbolic and occult. By moving certain “letters” and replacing them with “numbers” corresponding to their special kabbalistic alphabet, the Rabbis were trying to reach the full knowledge of all the eternal truths in the Bible.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE NUMBER 3

Continuing the analysis of Rasputin’s papers, Manteia was struck by three drawings, represented in a circular format, and absolutely similar in the inside “characters.” Only the external border was different. Manteia was familiar with those symbols, representing the classical talisman/amulet of Arabian origin, and the three words written in “celestial alphabet” in the external border. In his paper, Rasputin was reporting about a trip to Egypt, and the ecstasy he experienced in front of the Sphinx surrounded by the three pyramids in the Giza desert. The Sphinx appeared to him as a prodigious and powerful goddess, striking terror and respect, in the arcane silence. Rasputin reportedly spent several sleepless nights in awe of that ageless stone leviathan. The Sphinx symbolizes the secret of occult wisdom. According to a legend, she opens her stone mouth to reveal God’s will only to paranormal psychics. Here Rasputin received the mystical intuition to compose the Oracle.

“During my sleepless nights, I was gazing at the sky, in a North direction, where letters and characters created by stars appeared to me,” Rasputin writes. “Some rising, others descending, in a luminescent celestial alphabet. The oriental people have contemplated the prophecies in the amazing wandering stars. I have followed them as well, and I can say that there are three fundamental elements in the creation of my Oracle: Air—Fire—Water. Without these three elements nothing can be asked, nothing will be revealed”

These were the words of Rasputin, and in fact the three words seen in the external border of his mysterious drawings were AIR, FIRE and WATER. These words, engraved in the talisman/amulets, allow the user to ask the Oracle and obtain the response. Clearly the Russian starets was consistent with the theory of kabbalistic/esoteric science when he composed his Oracle on the philosophy of the number 3, the perfect number (Ternary Law) and its fundamental principles. There is, in fact, a surprising concurrence among the various esoteric, philosophical and religious credos, in considering 3 a number harmonious and eurythmic.

The number 3 represents the Total Power in his triune form, the Supreme Being as Divine Revelation. The synthesis permeating the pure esotericism affirms that the fundamental movement of the vibratory rhythmic universe is present under a triplicity aspect: Vibration—Idea, Vibration—Substance, Vibration—Sound.

These three aspects correspond to the three inseparable elements constituting the Divine Nature: Existence, Conscience, Happiness/Love.

The Divine Trinity is composed by the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

In the sapient and intelligent expression of the kabbalah, the equivalent of the Christian Trinity is the Divine Triangle: the Crown (Kether)=the Father, the Sapience (Hochmah)=the Verbum, and the Knowledge (Binah)=the Holy Spirit.

The three principles of male and female androgyny, in total harmony, are: Balance—Expansion—Attraction.

A brief summary of the book Sepher Yetzirah, reportedly by Abraham, mentions an overall concept of the kabbalistic theory. The book teaches the existence of One God, as the order and harmony that contribute to variety and multiplicity can only derive from the Unique Coordinator. The book explains the 32 ways of Sapience by which God irradiates his light. They are made up of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet, engraved in the sky, plus the first 10 numbers. His three forms are designated with these three analog terms:

- Sophar (Sephar)—the numbers
- Sopher (Siphur)—the word and voice of God
- Saphur (Sepher)—the Scripture and works of God

The Scripture of God is the Creation, the word of God is the Scripture and His thought is His word. Thought, Word, Scripture are one in God but three in Man.

To lead the 22 letters, the 22 Universal Archetypal, are three Mother letters: Aleph—Mem—Schin.

They represent the creative Triad of Mother letters to form:

- The generation of the Skies—Fire
- The generation of Earth—Water
- The generation of Spirit—Air.

Aleph reigns on Spirit and made Air in the Universe—Mem reigns on Water and made Earth in the Universe—Schin reigns on Fire and made Sky in the Universe. Aleph is Air as it is pronounced with light aspiration, Mem is Water as it is mute, and Schin is Fire for its hissing sound.

And the kabbalah admits only three elements, instead of the fundamental four. Earth—in fact—is Man. Fire is substance of sky, Water substance of Earth, Air, the breath/word of God is intermediate of the other two, and dominates and reconciles them.

Fire is Summer, Water is Winter, Air is Spring and Fall.

Every time and season has the same numerical positioning of Man and World. The other 10 numbers, called Sefirot, are divine emanations, forms of the infinite, with no limits in the future, the past, the evil, the good.

The ancient kabbalis recognized three spiritual elements in the human soul: Psyche, Nefesh, Neshamah; i.e. the sensitive soul, the reasoning soul and the pure spirit. The three forms of Soul correspond to the three Worlds: physical, intellectual, divine. So the world is divided in animal, mineral and vegetable.

Three are the basic expectations of humanity: freedom, justice, peace. According to the Far Eastern tradition the great triad is: Sky—Tien, Earth—Ti, Man—Jem.

The hermetic symbolism of Creation: soul, spirit, body.

The hermetic symbolism of colors: black, white, red.

The three phases of hermetic medicine: momentary action, incomplete transformation, total medicine or permanent transformation.

The Law of concomitant actions and reactions, known in the Orient with the sanskrit name of karma can be described in three moments: Prarabdha-Karman (karma in past lives), Agami-

Karman (karma in formation), and Sancita-Karman (karma to be developed in future life—reincarnation).

The three spiritual beings: archetype uncreated—divine idea (in the world divine plan), transcendent spirit—supernatural intellect (in the universal plan), and individual being—the man (in the individual form plan).

Three are God's names in the Jewish religion: Jod, Jah, Jaho (living God, true God, Saint God).

For the Buddhist, the precious trinity: the Buddha—the Doctrine—the Church.

Three are the Angels, elements of Divine Creation: Mikael—king of the Sun and the Thunder; Samuel—king of the Volcanoes; Anael—prince of the Astral light.

Three are the worlds according to Sanskrit lexicon: informal—subtile—coarse.

The Triple Temple: past, present, future. The Triple Hindu revelation: Brahma, Vishnu, Shiva.

In Man the number three is: head, heart, stomach. In the ancient Greek mythology the Universe is subdivided into three brother-gods: Jupiter, Poseidon, Hades.

Three are God's names according to the Egyptians: Osiris, Isis, Horus.

God is referred with three names in the traditional translation of the Old Testament: Elohim, Yahweh, Yahweh Elohim.

Three are the kabbalistic planets/stars: Sun—Moon—Mercury.

Three are the dominant planets in the traditional astrology: the Zodiac, the Decan, the Day of Birth.

In the ancient alchemy three were the fundamental laws to create the philosophical stone: to use only one vase, only one fire, only one tool and identify the three basic colors: blue, yellow, and ruby-red.

The Western Freemason order is divided into Blue Freemasonry, Superior Freemasonry, and Illuminate order.

The great order: Invisible Masters, Threshold Guardians, Rosicrucian Order.

The three classes: capitolar or red, philosophical or black, administrative or white. Also three the grades in the Martinist order: bluemasons, redmasons, blackmasons.

The Italian psychic Cagliostro adopted three grades for the rituals of the Egyptian Masonry he founded: brother, disciple, master, and three objectives: the reintegration of Man in his original purity, his approach to God, and the Spiritualization of Humanity.

The training of Zen—the Buddhist origin school—is in three phases: perfect morality, perfect meditation, and perfect intuition, and the initiation approaches: Zen—Sufism—Kabbalism.

Three are the steps allowing Man to purify himself and become free as well as spiritually powerful: wake up and overtake logic reasoning, use intuition, and reach illumination.

According to the brahminic credo God is triune: Brahma, Maya, Vishnu (father, mother, son—essence, substance, life). The legend of Krishna goes back to the sources: Virgin-mother, Universe-god, Trinity. The Triad, according to Brahmins: the father, Nara, eternal male, the mother, Nari, eternal female, and the son, Viradi, Verbum Creator. Nature—as product of the Verbum Creator—is revealed in three forms: Brahama, the spirit of the divine world, Shiva, the body of the natural world, Vishnu, the soul of the human world.

Three are the keys to understand the symbolic meaning of Genesis as found in the Egyptian symbology, and three the ways Egypt's ministers used to express their thinking: the first was clear and simple, the second symbolic and the third sacred and hieroglyphic.

Heraclitus also had three ways: talkative, meaningful, hideful.

Three are the Pythagorean definitions of the Delphi mysteries: know yourself, know the Universe, and know God.

Three are the doors open to the supernatural world: sleep, dream, and ecstasy.

Three the essential elements of divination: the sensitive person and his word, the observation of signs and material data, the pure imagination.

Three the steps in clairvoyance: retrospection, divination, ecstasy.

The Oracle of Zoroaster says: the number three is king of the Universe, the monad is the beginning.

In Babylon the Triad is composed by: Anu—sky, Bel—earth,

Ea—water. Three are the years of famine, three the days of plague, and three the wounds of Egypt in the Old Testament.

In the New Testament three are the Magi, and three their gifts: gold, incense and myrrh.

Three the names given to the Son of God after his teaching in the Synagogue: Rabbi—Jehoshua—Nazariah.

And Jesus is called: Messiah, Rabbi, Martyr. Three the years of his teaching, three the Apostles to witness the Transfiguration (Peter, John and Jacques). Three the Apostles in the Gethsemane, three the hours, three the circles of Agony. Three times Satan appears to Christ and three times Christ implores Abba Pater. Three times he finds the disciples asleep. Three times Peter is accused and three times he abjures. For three days Jesus was in the Sepulcher.

THE CELESTIAL ALPHABET

The analysis of the Oracle showed the sapience and knowledge of Rasputin, covering various sciences, and in particular occultism and esotericism. One example is how the talismans/amulets have been set up and drawn, using the special celestial alphabet.

Following a kabbalistic principle, Rasputin used the word ARARITA linked significantly to the symbols of the seven astrological planets known in the ancient times. These planets are supposed to be very powerful and influential in determining human destiny. Rasputin was certainly intuitively aware of the existence of the Superconscious (foreconscious—subliminal) that allows us to master the prodigious force of the Supersensual.

All modern scholars of parapsychology are in agreement regarding the existence of a mysterious sense, belonging to the Mind's superconscious level, as well as the five senses. Inside the Superconscious is found the so-called sixth sense, better defined as Supersensual. It is a prodigious force able to communicate above and beyond the traditional five senses to the benefit of the entire human genre. The magical force is in fact unknown in natural science. The Supersensual can understand, reveal and explain the mysterious laws of nature.

In every person there are hidden magical powers, defined by modern parapsychology as “extrasensory perception” or ESP. The amount of information contained in the document received by Peter was clearly showing to Manteia, himself a scholar of occultism and astrology, that Rasputin had “intuitively” grasped a methodology, that, once presented in a readable form, possessed the value and the force of the ancient Oracles.

Manteia gave the name of “Phycopitology” to Rasputin’s method. It is a system that allows the user to receive “responses” to specific questions. Psyche=mind, concentration and repetition of the enquiry. Pitio=oracle, magical ritual regarding the positioning of the Elements. Logos=the response to the enquiry. Of course, as in any extrasensory activity, the personal participation and involvement of the user is required, to ensure effectiveness of the operation. A reproduction of the “celestial alphabet” created by Rasputin during his sleepless nights in the Giza desert, in front of the Sphinx, and of the three talismans/amulets corresponding to the elements FIRE, WATER and AIR, is in the following pages.

THE LIFE OF THE GREAT MUZHNIK GRIGORI RASPUTIN

IN THE SIBERIAN VILLAGE OF TOBOLSK

Grigori Yefimovich Rasputin is an extraordinary and enigmatic personality, impossible to understand without knowing, at least partially, the customs, habits, origin, history and psyche of the Russian people. The vast Euroasiatic Russian territory has been invaded throughout history by thousands of barbarians: Goths, Vandals, Scandinavians, Bretons, Germans, Huns—men of different races coming from the Baltic, the Rhine, the Don and Tartars, from the far-reaching countries of Siberia and India. The greatness of Russia began in 1497 under Ivan III. The Mongols were defeated and destroyed by Ivan the Terrible, who conquered the Kingdom of Astrakhan and invaded Livonia. He was cruel and inflexible and terrorized everywhere with cold ferociousness. The Cossacks conquered Siberia. After him Peter the Great was the head of the Romanov dynasty, until the massacre of Nicholas II and the entire Imperial family. The country of Russia, particularly at the time of Rasputin, was a mysterious and indecipherable place, consisting of several races and cultures, religious beliefs and superstitions, influenced by a sort of mysticism in all aspects of life. The Russian people seemed to be always waiting for a messianic leader in direct communication with the Invisible and the Divine.

Given this scenario, the “phenomenon of Rasputin” was able to touch the soul of the Russian people, from the Emperor’s family to the simple muzhik. Grigori Yefimovich Rasputin, son of a peasant coach driver, Yefim Andrejevich, was born in 1871 in the village of Pokrowskoje, in the poor district of Tobolsk, in West Siberia, on the Tura river. Grigori (Grischa was his boyish name) spent his early life in his father's house. Grischa's father, a peasant who had a small horse breeding business, was considered the "wise man" of the village, even though he could not read or write. Often, in his stable, community meetings took place to decide in the name of the village or simply to share information and conversation. Grischa, a bright and rebellious young man, enjoyed his moments of relaxation among the father's horses. His best friend was a horse to which he used to talk as one would to a companion. He liked freedom, light, sounds and fresh air. He was also very religious and an avid reader of the Bible and the life of Christ.

The Scriptures, with their illustrations, moved his imagination and creativity, and the protagonists became his heroes and a model of beauty, honor and mystery. Premonitions of an uncommon life appeared precociously in Grischa's life. He was fascinated by the stories of the errant starets, pilgrims charged with inexplicable powers, capable of molding a person's soul and will to a point where they achieved full control of anyone's personality to meet peace, freedom, and health. When he was eight a tragic incident affected the growing spiritual life of Grischa. His older brother, Mischa, while playing, fell in the waters of the Tura river. Grischa jumped immediately into the water, trying desperately to save his brother. The current was too strong and both boys would have died without the providential intervention of a local farmer. Unfortunately Mischa died of pneumonia a few days later and Grischa became seriously ill for a long time. The young man, once exuberantly healthy, was transformed into a pale and fragile boy. The sickness and the subsequent long convalescence created an odd sensitivity in Grischa, which slowly became the extraordinary power of intuition and divination.

He was about 12 when a singular incident happened in the village of Pokrowskoje. A poor muzhik had been robbed of his only horse. This horse was the only means of subsistence for the man, and at the house of Rasputin's father the robbery was commented upon and disapproved of. Grischa had been in bed for days suffering with fever. Resting by the fireplace he was listening to the grown-up's conversation. Suddenly his trembling voice was heard: "The robber ... is Ivan ... the Red." Those words were received by general surprise. Ivan the Red was a rich merchant, well known and respected, and nobody could suspect him. Later, during the night, Ivan the Red was seen trying to let the poor man's horse escape from his stable. Everybody thought that God had spoken through Rasputin's voice.

And year after year these extraordinary phenomena of clairvoyance became routine. People went to see Rasputin to ask questions, discuss problems, and talk about health. Rasputin listened silently and then provided his advice, with wise and discerning knowledge. He cured the sick, settled disputes. He implored and ordered, requested and obtained. Grigori was also very powerful with animals and trained wild horses in a very simple and effective way, until they became obedient and friendly. Was he really super powerful or only clever? Victor, the stable keeper told several times this story:

Yefim owned a stallion that was so furious people believed that it should be killed. The big horse was a terror. He kept kicking around, even when they were bringing food. "Wait," said Grischa one day, "let me go into the stable." A small crowd followed cautiously. When the top door was open, the stallion, his ears lowered and his mouth foamy, rushed to the door neighing furiously. Everybody ran away except Grischa, who stopped in front of the stallion's face, and started to talk to him in a calm and soothing tone of voice. Nobody could hear the words, nor their meaning. Rasputin talked to the stallion for a while, until the animal, apparently relaxed, went back to eating his forage. Then Grischa opened the door completely and entered the stable. Continuing to talk in the same calm tone of voice, he neared the stallion and caressed him on his neck. The stallion violently shook but continued to eat. After a while he was totally tamed and quietly joined the other horses.

Another unusual event happened to Rasputin when he was nearly 20. His father had been lying sick in bed for more than ten days and the village's doctor was helplessly trying to cure him. One evening Grigori fell in a trance and revealed to the amazed doctor the nature of the illness and how to cure it.

At the age of 20 Rasputin married Fedorovna Preskovia, a wealthy and beautiful village girl, with whom he had been engaged for a year. They went to live in his father's house. Now Rasputin was wearing a thick reddish beard that made him look like a religious person. He was healing sick people and taming horses with ease, and his reputation started to spread outside his district. But Grigori was not satisfied. A feeling of restlessness, of unfulfillment, very difficult for him to control, possessed him. He felt an unconscious desire for knowledge, for experiencing. He seemed to be constantly looking for something that was beyond him. Silent spirits accompanied him and he was questioning them, without reply. In his life there was silence and no guiding light. Meanwhile he was working as a coachman, like his father. He was transporting goods and passengers from Tobolsk to Tiumen and Werchoturje, at the foot of the Ural Mountains. Although a married man, he had a lustful extramarital sex life. He was known as a very heavy drinker and womanizer.

LIFE AND LUST AT THE MONASTERY

Then one day the great light Rasputin was looking for finally appeared. When he was about 30 he met a student from the Ecclesiastic Academy, the young theosophist Miletj Saborowkj, whom he used to take by coach to the convent of Werchoturje. This young man was a member of an unusual Confraternity called "Men of God." The Russian Orthodox Church considered these people apostates. Grigori did not return home and stayed at the Monastery where he came to know better the Confraternity that is also called "The Sect of Flagellants." They were in penitence at the Monastery, hoping to be readopted by the Mother Church. The sect was founded 200 years earlier by Danilo Filipich, who wrote: "Keep my Laws secret, never reveal them not even to your father or your mother. Be firm and silent even if tortured with fire and whip." In practice, to reach the Divine Communion, these people went through all sorts of perversions and lust. In the woodland and forests they used to dance furiously, and their leader whipped those who were not participating. Exhausted, they would lose consciousness, be taken over by ecstasy and vertigo, and abandon themselves to orgiastic and debauched rituals, believed to be protected by the Divine Grace. The sensual strength and intemperate character of Rasputin made him an ideal "candidate" to receive the divine grace and entrance into the sect. Here he found the fulfillment of his needs and of his abnormal imagination. Miletj became the source from where Rasputin's thirst was appeased. The young theologian found in Rasputin a rustic but enthusiastic brother, rich in intuition and quick to understand.

Their encounter changed Rasputin's life. In the Monastery he also met father Makary, an old and wise monk who became his master. Makary was so old that nobody knew his true age, but his mind was clear and fertile and he possessed supernatural wisdom. Father Makary thought Rasputin all the sublime disciplines of the Oriental occultism and became his mentor and guide. Rasputin remained several years in the Monastery, where his strong memory made him conversant with the encyclopedic knowledge. At the same time, the rituals and customs of the sect entered his personality and took over completely his already predisposed mental and sensual nature. Grigori had the power to duplicate his persona. The spiritual "ego" was moving above and beyond the boundaries of human nature and flew on the top of the psyche, guiding normal intelligence and pushing the "hypersensitivity" to excesses of fanaticism. But the material "ego" was down to earth, desperately attached to sensual pleasures, prisoner of female beauty.

The strong and complex nature of Rasputin found a natural way of life in the rituals of the sect, abjured by the traditional Church. Rasputin had the ability to talk to people's souls, providing a message of faith and hope. Yet at any moment his warm and fascinating look would change and his eyes would be full of bestial passion and sexual desire. He could not resist the temptation to possess a woman, and only a few women had the strength to resist him. Most women offered their body to him for veneration, for fear, for lust, for exaltation, for need, for love, for hate. The irresistible attraction for women went together with an insatiable gluttony. In particular he loved fish cooked with exciting spices together with warm Spanish wine. Usually a good dinner ended with an irresistible inclination for dancing. When he started to dance one of the many dances of his great land, his face was transfigured and his body became charged with an interior force. The most difficult dancing steps came out easy, often solemn. At such times he looked transcendental and pure, like he was part of another world. It was impossible to recognize the vicious individual seen before.

Was all this a fabrication, and Rasputin just a mere comedian? We have reason to believe that Rasputin was in good faith and the duplication of his personality just an aspect of an extraordinary nature.

Father Makarj believed in the theory of reincarnation and explained it to Rasputin, who was an attentive and intelligent pupil. The ancient pagan doctrines coming from Asia and dealing with metempsychosis and reincarnation have been recently recalled by scholars of occultism and theosophy. According to reincarnation, Man is supposed to rebirth several times and his soul to move from one body to another till reaching perfection.

This doctrine originates mainly from the Indian and Buddhist tradition, but according to theosophy and spiritualism the reincarnation cannot take place in an animal's body. The reincarnation of the souls can only manifest in conditions of progressive existence, in this world or others, to represent a continuous ascent to the triumph of Spirit.

The science called Entelechy, which has the objective of studying and diffusing the knowledge of the Enteles, the complete, reminds us that the law of reincarnation is not only the proof of mercy, but also the perfect justice of the Father. It differs from human justice because the condemnation of the sinners is not ab aeterno, but it is such that, after the expiation, the sinners may return to the original purity.

But let us go back to Rasputin's life. Grigori Rasputin was no longer the miserable muzhik from the faraway district of Tobolsk. Time, with its unstoppable flow, had caused his maturation. His physical strength, typical of the people of his geographic area, and his will, stubborn and tough, forced him to strive against the desperate misery of his youth. He lived for more than 30 years among his people, where he learned to sacrifice himself, to suffer and to hope.

One day he went to see father Makarj and ask for his blessing. He wanted to leave the Monastery. From Werchoturje, Grigori went directly to see his relatives and say farewell to them. Rasputin wanted to be a starets stranniki, a saint pilgrim, because he felt purified through sin. These errant preachers were well known in Russia, and always found assistance and restoration when needed. They were commonly known as Podpolnik, people of the family room, literally of the place under the staircases, because this was the shelter usually given to them in the houses they visited.

In his travelling Rasputin had the opportunity to know even better the characteristics of the Russian people and soul. During his wandering he was fully initiated into the secret practices of his sect up to the so-called “mystical death,” the terminal and final act of the obscene ceremony. He wore a white shirt, the vest of spirits and angels. He danced and sung to the light of twelve black candles, until his body was completely frozen, the tongue paralyzed, the mind distorted and his body whipped with the lash made by willow-tree leaves.

Then he took part in the “sublime affray,” an activity where monstrous coupling was the rule. His pilgrimage lasted more than three years. His father, mother, wife and sons were totally unaware of what he did. Words coming from travelers reported to have seen him in feasts and in ceremonies, where he was referred to as “the new starets.” He was helping the fishermen of the high Tura Valley. He was teaching rituals and sacred hymns. He was involved in magic acts with young women in the forests. He was creating crosses with trees and was praying together with his disciples, again mainly women. Songs, dances, and lust were all part of the “divine service.”

Grigori, being radically transformed by his religious fervor, caused surprising recoveries. To the muzhiks that thanked him, he replied, “God healed you, I am only His servant.” The Pope Ivan of Kronstad became interested in Rasputin because of his reputation as “healer” and wanted to meet him. The Pope spoke with him in the Cathedral of St. Petersburg and told him, “Son, I have felt your presence. You bring with you the flame of true religion.” Rasputin knew the Bible by heart and gave his own interpretation to the Sacred Scriptures. At that time the Orthodox Church was opposed to lay men reading the Bible.

One day by a sudden decision, as he used to do, Rasputin returned home and asked hospitality of his wife, like a normal stranniki. In the silence of the house he started to pray and continued for several days. In the village they considered him a starets as he was saying "saint" words. His biggest fans were the local women falling in love to him, in a mixture of mother-like affection and mystical fervor. The starets Rasputin, in an underground chapel, was healing the sick people coming from the villages. His most remarkable feature, after his eyes, was his voice. His voice was warm and modulated and resembled an organ playing softly or the Caucasian velvets. He spoke, he reassured, and he gave guidance. The sick person calmed down, forgot the pain and relaxed.

The number of sick people visiting Rasputin was increasing day by day, and the practice kept him very busy and started to cause unusual physical reactions. His face assumed a sort of earthly color and caused him to look tired and in suffering. From time to time he stopped his work. "Bring me tea, a lot of tea, and very hot." At the end of his healing, Rasputin fell into a strange trance lasting for hours. It was like a nervous reaction, a coma-like condition, very similar to death.

It is known that the Tibetan Lamas exercise their great healing by transferring into themselves the sickness of the person they are in process of curing. Their physical strength made it possible for them to get better and finally to get rid of the sickness.

Probably Rasputin was going through something like this. He was, undoubtedly, in possession of a charge of so called "beneficial waves." These are special irradiations existing in supernatural individuals who can act therapeutically and thaumaturgically. These individuals can control a personal fluid that is transferred into the sick person, or in a part of his body, by hand imposition. The fluid can have instant effect and heal on the spot. A related infusion is gained by the presence of personal magnetism.

The modern esoteric science defines "mana" as this original strength of healing. It is strength deriving from animal energy and is formed by electric energies coming from the soul, which has power unknown to human science.

The force is supposed to have three grades:

1. Low mana: related to natural objects, from mineral crystals to the human organism.
2. Medium mana: irradiated from the reasoning centers of the human mind.
3. Sublime mana: proceeding from the supernormal faculties of the mind and causing supernatural reactions.

Rasputin will be a fascinating case study for modern parapsychology. The village's Pope, Father Pjotr, called Rasputin a damned apostate and condemned those who listened to and believed him. This excommunication resulted in increasing the number of visitors coming from everywhere. A policeman, sent by the Pope, came back converted. The village people told that Rasputin had the power to stop the rain when it was damaging the harvest, and to make the rain when the earth needed it.

The reputation of this new starets rapidly spread beyond the province. Everybody called him starets, but in fact he was only a muzhik. He never received any religious order and was called starets only by respect. Grigori continued to produce surprising prodigies and then he retired to pray, in a mystical and silent way. After this ritual he used to walk into the streets and move among the crowd in a slow and solemn behavior. His eyes showed happiness, serenity and benignity. The farmers fell at his feet, kissing his hands and his vest.

TO THE COURT OF RUSSIA: SPLENDOUR AND DECLINE

Rasputin started his pilgrimage to Moscow, to St. Petersburg and, without fully realizing it, towards the Imperial Court of Russia. In the village of Pokrowskoje, there was concern for Anna, the cousin of pope Pjotr. She was a woman of good reputation, pious and generous, married to the merchant Dimitri. She had a son at the age of 20, but, to her regret, he was the only one. She was now nearly 50, but still young looking, thanks also to her excellent health. Anna, in the last two months, had not felt well. Her body, usually fit, looked inflated and she was not smiling anymore. The doctor came from the district of Tobolsk and his diagnosis was that Anna suffered from a malignant disease, and she could not be saved. Rasputin was informed of the situation by his wife. He went to see Anna and looked for a while at her sad face. Rasputin used to look at people using his eyes like a scalpel. Then his clear, calm and reassuring voice was heard, "Anna, do not worry, you are going to be a mother again. Be faithful to God."

The news spread rapidly throughout all the nearby districts and was received with mixed feelings. How could Anna, at her age, be a mother again? After a few months, Rasputin was proved right and everybody laughed at the Tobolsk doctor. So the reputation of Rasputin increased and spread to new villages and cities.

He was certainly not a normal individual, also from a physiological and psychological point of view. His innate hypnotic power was increased by the steadiness of his pupils. His eyes, of steel gray color, seemed capable of looking at the sun with the same easiness as at a shadow.

Rasputin never smiled. Instead he knew all the variances of the laugh, from the obscene to the sardonic, to the tragic. He possessed an innate suggestive power capable of turning away the instinctive repugnance his body was emanating. The physical appearance of Rasputin was really disturbing. He also used to dress very poorly, and modified this strange habit only during his late stay at Court. His face was often distorted in a morbid grimace, sensual and cruel. His small eyes, nearly colorless, were too close and his eyebrows too thick. A wart deformed his right eye. An irregular line divided his big head covered by uncombed hair. On his forehead was a purple scar. His skin, burned by the sun, was wrinkled, and his beard, reddish and hirsute, increased the unpleasant impression he presented. One day, as faith would have it, Grigori Rasputin, strange and biblical personality, was privileged to be invited to the Court of the Great Czars of Russia.

He was introduced by Father Teophan to Grand Duchess

Anastasia, confidant, and to dame Anna Wyrubova, personal friend of the Czarina. All were waiting for Rasputin. The presumptuous members of the nobility had already heard about the muzhik. They were skeptical and amused at the same time, with a morbid curiosity to see him. After all, the thaumaturgists were fashionable.

For the useless and stupid courtesans, the clairvoyant monks and fortuneteller gypsies were a delightful and amusing pastime, probably hiding a certain amount of sadism.

The Czar Nicholas II, following his father's habits, encouraged those strange individuals to frequent the Court. Nicholas II knew that Alexandra, the Czarina, was very pleased to know and listen to these people, and he wanted to please her. When Grigori Rasputin made his entrance into the elegant and luxurious halls of the Court, crowded with aristocrats, dames and high officers, nobody liked him. A murmur of displeased surprise greeted him. He entered slowly, walking in the typical manner of the poor muzhik. His look, his dress, and his face made a negative impression on those present. When he started to speak, the first sentences were practically incomprehensible. But he only needed a few seconds to get back his natural theatrical self-confidence. He continued to proceed slowly, under the close attention of the audience, and the tone of his voice progressively raised. The tone of his speech was grave and animated, and the more he spoke, the more it was binding. While he was speaking, his personal appearance also became authoritative and dignified. His head slightly inclined towards the left shoulder, and his small clear eyes, with blue tint, moved around restlessly, as if they were looking for something or somebody.

It certainly was this "look," restless initially and then magnetically powerful, that stopped, as by enchantment, the critical murmur reserved for Rasputin when he first entered. This strong and penetrating aspect seemed to have paralyzed the noble crowd. The magic was in his eyes, disconcerting at first, but then becoming friendly and confident. Also the voice, raucous, illiterate, and devastated by alcohol, opened wounds in the listener, but was also persuasive, grave, pleasant, and convincing.

While talking he used to turn his head to one side, like a minister in confession and then his speech was benign like his look. But suddenly, voice and look would change, and his entire body seemed like it was burning of an unbearable sensual passion, that made him tremble.

Once again, he could move away from this passionate approach to the serene and tender, shocking the listener. Rasputin was certainly a very good actor, with an intuitive instinct for the coup de théâtre. In these circumstances he moved his hands, usually folded on his chest, like an orchestra director, with force and elegance. The man was certainly helped by a powerful and innate force, the occult force of creating magnetism, balancing intuition with divination, polemics and leadership, charisma and wellbeing.

The Siberian starets had a very unique and personal attitude, in a country and at a time when aristocracy was given maximum power, and everybody, particularly the poor farmers, did not even dare to look at them in the eyes.

Rasputin never kissed the hands of aristocrats nor authorities, and he talked to them as equal to equal, with dignity and without fear. Rasputin's presentation at the Court lasted several hours and at the end he was the counselor and the friend of the Imperial family. When leaving, he saluted everybody in the same manner, without distinction of sex or social status. Solemn and enigmatic, he bent slightly and launched three kisses in the typical way of the wandering monks.

In the year 1904, the fame of Grigori Rasputin arrived in St. Petersburg. Father John of Kronstadt, known for his "visions," wanted to meet the Siberian prophet in his convent. After a long interview, he realized that Rasputin was touched by God. The Pope Ivan of Kronstadt was also a medicine man and succeeded in healing from a distance.

This was a mystery as well as a challenge for the scientific and medical world. His methods remained unknown and only Rasputin, who, by intuition, grasped them, tried to emulate him. The Dean of the theological University of St. Petersburg, prelate and confessor of the Czarina, asked Rasputin to visit him, in the hope that divine grace would have inspired that simple mind, a victim of demonic powers.

It is reported that the young and cultivated students of the Academy had believed that Rasputin was a charlatan; but after their initial skepticism they changed their mind and admired the “responses” of the stranniki. He showed them how to reach sapience in other ways than books. The Dean tried another confrontation with Rasputin, who kept his eyes on him all the time, until the Dean became so confused he would speak illogically. At the end of the meeting he asked Rasputin to bless him. Then he introduced Rasputin to the Bishop Hermogene Sator, who introduced him to the monk Yliodor of Zaryzin, a famed preacher, powerful and feared. He was tall and fit, with hypnotic eyes, a sharp and acute voice, and irresistible strength. At the beginning Yliodor did not trust Rasputin, but after the first meeting, now partially convinced, he decided to introduce him to the committee of the “True Russians,” an association of political reactionaries. The members of the association, as it appears from secret files subsequently disclaimed, feared the favor given by the Court to a number of charlatans, shamans, and fanatics of various sources. They agreed in a mutual complicity pact, to show friendship to Rasputin, hoping that, by controlling him, they could avoid a proliferation of personal enemies in the Court.

The grand duke Nicholas Nicolaievic, Commander in Chief of the entire Russian army was a sort of imperious giant, proud of his noble origin and ambitious for his position. He was very diffident when he first talked to Rasputin. He decided to unmask him and challenged him to heal somebody under his very eyes. The grand duke had a faithful servant, Andrej, who had suffered for several years of a hic-cough crisis that weakened him to the point of death. Rasputin prepared a mixture of medicinal herbs and deposed it on Andrej’s stomach, put his right hand under his head and prayed for him. In ten minutes the hic-cough had disappeared and Andrej was completely healed. This episode made Nicholas very close to Rasputin and their friendship lasted several years. The starets used a similar treatment with Anna Wyrubova, who was severely wounded in a hunting accident. Thanks to Rasputin she was perfectly healed.

After many years of pilgrimage, the simple muzhik of Pokrowskoje finally succeeded in being accepted at the Court of Russia, in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

Rasputin loved to visit the gypsies that used to crowd the shore of the Neva during each summer and produce shows in their colorful tents. The elegant society of St. Petersburg was fascinated by their performances. Grigori was well known and loved among the gypsy community. They were aware of his origins and respected him for his qualities as a medicine man, and understood that he was going to become a very powerful man in Russia. They also knew his inclination for women and wine.

One episode brought Rasputin into high regard among the gypsies. Once a rambling dog attacked the two twin brothers, sons of the chief of the gypsy community. The big animal was dangerously close to the boys. He was growling and menacing, his eyes red and foaming with rage. Rasputin happened to be there. He moved, slowly but resolutely towards the scene and without any other words put his hands around the neck of the beast and threw it away against the wheels of a carriage. He then immediately took the boys into a tent and prepared one of his miraculous mixtures of medicinal herbs. After having cleaned the leg wounds caused by the dog, Rasputin covered them with ointment, and started to pray. All the other gypsies joined him in his prayer so that the murmur became a rosary. The father was very concerned as he noticed the high fever in his children, and told Rasputin: "Grigori ... their forehead is burning." Rasputin, extremely pale and sweating, said, "Be faithful. Your children will survive. So wants God." And so it happened. A week after, the twin brothers were playing with the other boys.

Even at Court, Rasputin maintained his passion for dancing. Sometimes the desire to dance was so strong that he had to do it regardless of the place or the company. In the middle of a conversation, he stood up and invited one of the women in the group to sing for him one of the melancholic folk songs of his native land. He then started to dance to the rhythm of the song in a very natural and instinctive style.

It was during one of these dancing performances that three

Czar messengers arrived and asked: "In the name of the Czar, is there a person called Grigori Yefimovich known as Rasputin?"

He replied, annoyed, "Yes, I am." And the messenger said, "The Czarina is looking for you and wants to see you at once. Please come with us."

He explained that the three-year-old Czarevich was dying. He suffered from hereditary hemophilia. He had accidentally fallen, causing an internal hemorrhage, high fever and inguinal swelling. Rasputin was listening in silence and his body went through a total change from the dancing mood. He became extremely serious, and, with his body trembling, started praying. The crowd joined him and all kneeled down. When Rasputin stood up he was heard to say, "The Czarevich was dying. I prayed God for him and the crisis is over. He will survive." Then he jumped on the messenger's horse and left, taking the scared man with him.

It is the year 1907, in the Castle of Zarskoje Selo, the favorite residence of Czar Nicholas II and Czarina Alexandra of Hesse. In this castle, a place of great joy and terrible sorrow, Alexei was born the 30th of July, 1904. Every corner of the garden, every room of the building contains love's secrets, sweet memories, and painful shadows. The Czar was in love with Alexandra with a mutual affection, but their relationship was hurt by a sad situation. The beautiful Alexei was born very delicate, suffering from hemophilia. The Court's doctor could not cure him. The servants in the Court whispered that it was a divine punishment from the oppressed poor people of Russia. The Czar, a gentleman of small stature, was a very complex person. Shy and weak, he was not the right sovereign to handle a country of extreme vastness, crossed by internal social problems, dominated by a vain aristocracy inept to represent its role, but only involved in personal intrigues. Fatalist, resigned and choleric, the Czar was obsessed by the terror of misfortunes.

An atrocious "karma" was really influencing his country, hit by a series of natural and social disasters.

The Czarina was called niemka—"the German"—but unfairly so, as she was able to assimilate the most ancient and obscure characteristics of the Russian soul, with their subtle religious, mystical and sometimes superstitious approach. Little Alexei was suffering of hemophilia, a hereditary malady that does not forgive, a disease of the blood that loses the ability to coagulate. Hemorrhages became very frequent and difficult to control and stop. Sometimes even a small trauma, a superficial wound or a coughing attack, can provoke a violent bleeding.

During this time, Russia was troubled by several insurrections and social uprisings, and the Czar, scared and confused, renounced his authority and left full power to the Head of his Cabinet and the Grand Dukes who stifled the rebellions with blood and great cruelty.

The Czar and his wife, overcome by a profound melancholy, preferred to live in the castle of Zarskoje Selo, finding relief in religious mysticism and in the common faith in the strannikis. Alexei was not getting better, and all cures and treatments seemed useless. Various medicine men and thaumaturgists tried in vain to help him: Professor Philippe from France, the hysterical visionary Daria Ossipova, the disfigured and exalted Mitja with his oracle-teller and shaman Badmajeff, the French magician Papus and the famous medicine man Encausse. The Czar was born in 1868, the Czarina in 1872. The four daughters Olga in 1895, Tatjana in 1897, Maria in 1899 and Anastasia in 1901.

At about midnight of the 16th of June 1907, Rasputin entered from a small door situated at the back of the palace and was received in the Czar's private office. Present with the Czar and his wife were their four daughters, Doctor Badkin and Anna Wirobowa. Rasputin's look contrasted dramatically with that of the aristocrats crowding the office.

He kissed the Czar and the Czarina and said, "Little mother, I have prayed for the Czarevich one hour ago. He is improving and will not die." The Czarina was very pale and her lips trembled. "In reality you have made a miracle, Father Grigori, one hour ago the fever disappeared and Alexei was feeling better."

Rasputin replied, "He will survive. Take me to see him now." Anna Wirobowa, the Czarina's confidant, lighted two candles in front of an icon representing Mother Mary.

Little Alexei was asleep and seemed quiet. In the dark of his bedroom the Czarina saw Rasputin kneel down and pray ardently. After a while Rasputin stood up and with his right hand touched the forehead of the boy in a mysterious sign. "Your son, little mother, is sleeping and safe. The fever is gone. He will live." Those present remarked in astonishment that the bruise caused by his fall had disappeared from his forehead. All that day he had suffered earaches, headaches and muscular pain. Two hours before he fell asleep and now was slowly waking up. Rasputin, whom he did not know initially, scared him, so Rasputin told him "No fear, Alexei, now you are fine. I have sent away all your troubles and tomorrow you will be playing again. I will teach you a lot of games."

Rasputin, when speaking to Alexei, undoubtedly used his powerful hypnotic power, but in a very confidential and friendly way. He told him about the great country Siberia and told him the old stories heard when he was a boy. There everything was different. Men were good, strong and generous, and even the animals could be understood by men.

These stories worked on the psyche of Alexei and created a feeling of wellbeing and confidence with regard to Rasputin. The magnetic "prana" was functioning. Rasputin made a great impression on the Czar and his family. They wanted him to stay with them forever. The Czar's personal diary reads on the 19th day of July 1907: "We have met a man from God, called Grigori coming from Tobolsk. His prayers have saved Alexei from a sure death." The local Cossack Derevenko was the bodyguard of Czarevich Alexei. He was strong and massive, but simple at heart and ready to give his life for the boy. Initially he did not like Rasputin, but changed his mind when he saw what he did for Alexei. For him Rasputin was the protector sent by God.

It is reported that Rasputin was involved in spiritualistic practices in St. Petersburg and that he seemed to master a natural predisposition. He had certainly followed the school and teaching of two famous Russians, Alex Aksakov and Alex Nikolajevic. The first is considered the father of metapsychic research and sponsored the Foundation of Psychic Studies in Moscow. The second gave a remarkable contribution to the development of serious psychic studies and metapsychic questions in Russia. They both died in St.

Petersburg in 1903.

SCANDALS AND INTRIGUES AT THE COURT

The destiny of the Siberian muzhik was now definitely marked. “The beloved friend”—this is how the Imperial family called him—had become irreplaceable. He was consulted for help and advice on projects, regulations, orders and enemies.

The gratefulness for the thaumaturgist Rasputin seemed to be without limits. In such a situation, Rasputin used all his power to attack what he considered the “fake” shamans and thaumaturgists who used to crowd the Russian Court. He did the same for the useless and corrupt bureaucrats, responsible for oppressing the people instead of serving them.

Unfortunately—but history cannot be made with “ifs” and “buts”—Rasputin probably arrived at the Court when it was already too late. The Russian situation was profoundly deteriorated, and so many people who took advantage of the moral devastation of the ruling class fought the generous effort carried out by Rasputin. The men and women who had lost confidence in the Imperial family got together to plot against Rasputin, but nobody had the courage to kill him. Among Rasputin’s enemies, the most powerful and pitiless was the monk Yliodor. Rasputin had been the only one to succeed in healing Alexei and his success had humiliated Yliodor, who had had a reputation as a medicine man. He had tried, unsuccessfully, to cure the Czarevich.

In the year 1911, Rasputin began to be openly involved in Russian politics and to play a role in the power struggle of that troubled country. He was the subtle mastermind that controlled the Czar and manipulated the decision making process in internal and foreign affairs. Hiring and firing, nominations and promotions of high officials and bureaucrats, were all decided with Rasputin’s involvement, very often in a temperamental and emotional manner. He had become extremely powerful. His house was always crowded and he loved to entertain. Since his arrival in Moscow his dress code had changed and now he enjoyed elegant clothes, silky black tunics and soft leather boots.

Three secretaries assisted him in handling daily correspondence and solving the less important questions: Yosif, Simonovich and Dobrowolskj. A peasant woman, Katja, loyal, incorruptible and proud, was his personal servant. She was an admirer of Rasputin, who severely reprimanded the more noisy and irreverent guests. Rasputin seemed authorized to do everything he wanted, and she loved that. She adored him when he was trying to write something with his long and bony hands. Usually the result was some unclear signs.

Rasputin, to overcome his embarrassment, used to say: "Katja, with these fingers I handle the Russian Empire." This statement was terribly true. In those days the fate of Russia was determined and guided by Rasputin, who also used to say, in reference to the Imperial couple, "The little father and the little mother are two big children. They are in bad need of guidance, and I am their guide."

In fact, the relations between Rasputin and the Imperial couple went through various stages. At the beginning they were impressed. They admired and were moved by the man who healed their son. Later they were confused, when Rasputin revealed his religious thoughts and his theatrical behavior. Even so, he always maintained a strong hold on them. Thanks to his extrovert personality, he fulfilled their empty life and was always available to assist their souls. He used to deal with them in a simple and direct style, sometimes avoiding the formal politeness they were used to being treated with.

Certainly they were impressed by this approach, which seemed to them to represent the true spirit of their country. The bizarre monk who spoke to them with an audacious familiarity, so different from the hypocrisy and adulation of the courtesans, became the symbol of the simplicity and honesty of the country people. The very people with whom they had lost contact. Rasputin's enemies, particularly among the courtesans, increased. Now also several women were to play a negative influence in his life.

One, in particular, was the famous and mysterious Elisalex. She was intimate with political personalities, had a decisive importance in Rasputin's destiny, and was linked to various scandals. Also affecting him was her friend Anna. Olga Losctina, former lover of the monk Yliodor, became Rasputin's favorite, and Nun Akulina of the convent of St. Thikon, once devil possessed but exorcised by Rasputin.

The daughters of the King of Montenegro were loyal to the muzhik and always present to his spiritual sessions. The numberless dames of the Court rivals in love and nicknamed Rasputinitzky.

But the most dangerous was Elisalex. This beautiful woman was the centerpiece of the conversation in all St. Petersburg's parties. Who was she?

The information is limited. She was born in the countryside, near Jaroslav, the daughter of a wealthy landowner who retired early in a great mansion rich with artworks collected during years of travelling all over the world. Only the Yussupov family was believed to have a richer library in their home. Elisalex was a very intelligent lady with a personality capable of manipulating people's minds. She was supposed to have unusual friends outside the Court and once was heard to say to Count Fedor, "My good friend, you know how the Russian people are indolent and dreamers. I know a person that can use this indolence and make it a powerful tool. This person is Vladimir Uljanov, called Lenin ... he is the right man for our country in these difficult times. I do trust him and I can confess you my secret, with the request of keeping it in strict confidence. I am a Bolshevik."

Elisalex had a controversial relationship with Rasputin. Once the Czarina was looking for him and the secret police found him in Elisalex's house. This gave rise to all sorts of speculations. A second episode was even stranger. One evening Rasputin was enjoying one of his "orgies" at the Yar Restaurant in Moscow. Good food, wine, dancing and gypsies. Rasputin was drunk. He talked without control about his love affairs in the Court and described in juicy detail his adventures. He went so far as to mention the Czarina, addressing her as staraja jenscina, an old woman, and showing a waistcoat he was wearing made by the Czarina for him.

The confidentiality of his conversation had created a certain embarrassment, but Rasputin continued freely and then started dancing with a beautiful gypsy. At the end of his dance he recognized Elisalex and furiously tore away her clothes, leaving her nearly naked on the floor. When the guests tried to stop him, he became even more enraged and rotated his belt around like a wounded beast. His friends were now disgusted and scared, and left the restaurant after paying the owner with some gold pieces for the bill and the damages. This incident created an enormous scandal and was used by Rasputin's enemies to denigrate him.

The mention of the Czarina's name in such a place was considered a sacrilege. The Chief of Police went to report these things to the Czar, but was not received. The Commander of the Imperial Residence, a good friend of Rasputin, had maneuvered to avoid it. The information on this embarrassing episode arrived at Court via indirect informants, and an official investigation was ordered. Still, Rasputin enjoyed such a good reputation that even a detailed report on that evening did not hurt him.

In fact, the Czarina declared that Rasputin (the Saint) was being tempted by the Devil and only thanks to divine assistance he saved himself. Instead, the responsibility for what happened was placed on the Devil himself, in this case Elisalex. She was forced into exile from Russia and thanks to her good contacts was able to reach Paris, where she remained.

The power of Rasputin was still very strong, but, unavoidably, his good luck was to abandon him. Some time after the accident, he was again reputed to have been involved in an event that was discussed around all of St. Petersburg. Rasputin had been invited to a top meeting with ten members of the Church in the presence of Bishop Hermogenes, including Yliodor and Mitjia. It was a plot to engage Rasputin in a furious litigation on certain questions. Bishop Hermogenes hit Rasputin with the heavy silver cross resting on his chest, as a symbol of his position. They even tried to pay him off with 500,000 rubles if he had moved away from the Imperial family. Rasputin was immovable. The Chief of Police from Kazan tried to blackmail Rasputin and told Yliodor, "Rasputin is a diabolical charlatan, depraved and lurid, and I have him in my hands." He had hoped to scare Rasputin, and threaten him with the dangers of reopening an obscure story about a rape in which Rasputin was supposed to be involved. The result was the replacement of the Chief of Police. The Home Office Cabinet Head also tried to have him killed, using hit men and former policemen. Once Rasputin was even hit by a coach and wounded.

Various interpretations had been given with regard to the magnetic force of Rasputin's eyes. He certainly was aware of his gift and made conscious and intelligent use of it. For example, it is interesting to recall the story of Semyon, a friend of Grigori, who was a witness to the Tobolsk's attempt. Informed sources reported that Yliodor, in his desire to destroy Rasputin, had promised the Mongol Boris a rich gift if he would kill Rasputin. Boris was a colossus performing in the city's squares, exhibiting force and fighting.

This is Semyon's narration: "That day I was with Grischa in Tobolsk. It was early morning and we were leaving the hospitable Natascia's house, where we had had fun with some girlfriends. Grischa was in a very good mood and we were joking. Few people were around because of the cold and the early hour. Suddenly Boris appeared, big as a giant. He was hidden and waiting to kill Rasputin. I was facing Boris, and Rasputin was in the other side. Boris took me with his unbelievable strength and literally threw me on the iced street, breaking my knees. I was screaming from pain. Rasputin had turned and was waiting for the beast to attack him. I knew that Rasputin was a robust person, but I doubted how long he could resist the attacks of the Mongol, greedy for the promised prize. Grischa avoided a punch and was fast to hit Boris on his face. That made Boris motionless for only a few seconds. This was enough time for Rasputin. He stared the colossus in the eyes in a way that seemed to go through his brain and make him defenseless. Boris tried to move his arms, but they fell down to his sides. Rasputin found the time to throw a heavy stone to his head and the Mongol collapsed on the floor. I had seen Rasputin making use of the strength of his eyes before, but never in such a fast and effective way. I really think this was a miracle and that Rasputin is protected by God."

THE END OF THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE AND THE DEATH OF RASPUTIN

A few months before Russia entered the war the fascinating and intriguing Elisalex, along with her loyal friend Margaritha, received in her aristocratic mansion three socially disparate personalities: the French ambassador Maurice Paleologue, the British ambassador Sir George Buchanan, and the starets Rasputin.

Unfortunately the topics of the meeting remain unknown. Cyril and Juri, the servants of Elisalex, who served dinner that night, were subsequently invited by friends and after several libations revealed some gossip. Apparently in the meeting, top decisions regarding the entrance of Russia into war were discussed. The two Western European ambassadors were convinced that Elisalex, as a friend of Rasputin was aware of the Czar's decisions. Elisalex was playing a double-jeux and trying to get information both from the ambassadors and Rasputin. Cyril and Juri reported all the cunning and tricks used by Elisalex and the ambassadors to succeed in their intent.

Rasputin, usually very talkative, spent more time listening than talking. He certainly felt the trap and his sensitive nature advised him to be careful. He was smiling at the compliments generously extended by the two important guests, and at the same time could not remove his eyes from the beautiful body of Elisalex. His brain, however, remained firm and strong. At the end of the meeting Rasputin is reported by Cyril and Juri to have said, "Certainly even the most wise men can make mistakes just as the dumbest at least once in their lives can do something of worth. As far as I am concerned I can tell you that money cannot buy the thoughts or desires of my heart."

Another episode documents that Elisalex played an important role in Rasputin's life. All of St. Petersburg was aware of the contrasts between Rasputin and Yliodor. The Count Witte, Prime Minister and personal friend of Rasputin, was trying to make peace between them because he loved Rasputin and feared Yliodor. Aware of the relationship between Rasputin and Elisalex, he intervened with the lady so that she could also help the reconciliation. An invitation to dinner was chosen as the best means to reach their goal. In attendance were Elisalex, as hostess, her friend Ljudmila, lover of Count Witte, Rasputin and Yliodor.

The dinner was proceeding very well with superb succession of hors d'oeuvres and entrées, accompanied by great wines. Then the conversation became more personal and Yliodor accused Rasputin of "overdoing" his healing powers in such a way that could not be accepted by a man of religion. Rasputin, touched to the quick, answered annoyed, "I am not a Saint nor a man blessed by God. Nobody can say so, as all men are sinners. I cannot heal anyone. I only pray God to do it for me."

Yliodor, with the arrival of Rasputin, had lost his reputation as the number one medicine man in town, and, worse yet, he had even lost his best client, the Czar's son. He was determined to try everything to return to the good graces of the Czar and the Imperial Family. Without discretion, he revealed his concerns and offered Rasputin a noticeable amount of money if he stopped healing Alexei. Rasputin's reply was ironic and sarcastic: "You cannot buy me. It would be like offering a comb to a Buddhist monk."

With these words dinner ended, unsuccessfully. In the meetings with the military chiefs, Rasputin was strongly opposed to the entrance of Russia into the war, and he stood as a fighter against the generals who favored it.

In this attitude Rasputin had remained the poor son of the steppe, in love with his land and opposed to all kinds of violence. Various officials, during these meetings, were to experience his angered tirades. A few months before entrance into the war, the Czar informed the Duma that Russia would not intervene in the Balkans. Evidently the wise recommendation from Rasputin had echoed in the Czar's mind and soul. The news was received bitterly by the high officials of the Army. The Grand duke Nicholas Nicolaievic immediately recognized the influence of Rasputin in the Czar's decision. The Grand Duke had been friendly with Rasputin for several years, but Rasputin's opposition to the war transformed the friendship into an implacable hate.

The Grand Duke Nicholas, in his position of Commander in Chief of all Russian armed forces, requested and obtained from the Czar an emergency meeting. Present were the Czar, Rasputin, the Foreign Minister Sazonov, the Home Office Minister Geremykine and the War Minister Suokhomlinov. The Grand Duke spoke at length outlining the advantages deriving to Russia from a prompt intervention in the Balkans. Only the Czar, supported by Rasputin, was against intervention. The meeting rapidly became a violent collision of ideas and personalities. At one point the Grand Duke addressed Rasputin shouting in his face: "Grigori Yefimovich, you are very ungrateful. Without Anastasia and me you would still be nobody, a miserable wanderer. Turkey is our enemy. This intervention is required for the good of Russia."

Rasputin had difficulty controlling himself, but succeeded in answering moderately: "God told us not to kill, and you are asking me to disobey him. Do not forget what I am telling you ... Do you know what a battlefield resembles? The killing of pigs at midnight." Finally the Czar intervened to avoid the worst. It was not easy. Fortunately a period of calm followed. Rasputin returned to his inspired tone, his head leaning to one side, his voice back to normal. He spoke to the Czar: "Little father, the noblemen and the farmers are often fighting, because each one ignores the life of the other. They both discuss things they don't know about. Please forgive us, little father."

After that controversial meeting his friends noticed that Rasputin's mood was changing and he seemed tormented by an unnatural nervousness. Contrary to his habits, he would sit silently, eyes fixed on emptiness, for a long time. Evidently the starets was beginning to realize that "something" was more powerful than his magnetic force in regard to the Czar's attitude in the war issue. His exceptional extrasensory perceptions did not fail. Russia was entering the war.

The Russian people, because of his openness and generosity, loved Rasputin. He was often seen receiving important amounts of money for rendered services, and then distributing them to the needy and those asking for help. He was particularly generous with the gypsies, whose songs he was fond of. He also never forgot his wife and children, and regularly sent money to them.

In St. Petersburg the dirty story of Kazan was told many, many times. In that town one evening, five thugs armed with knives and sticks attacked Rasputin to kill him. The strong Siberian did not lose his head. He broke the only light in the street and threw himself in the fight. He was able to get two of them by the head and crushed them together. The other three got scared and ran away. The Ochrana police agents were replaced, the Head of Police was sent to Siberia and the Bishop Hermogenes exiled to a Lithuanian monastery. By the end of 1911 Rasputin traveled to Constantinople. He was fed up with the calumnies and the attacks of which he had been the victim. When he was away the crisis of Alexei became more frequent and he received a cablegram from the Czarina: "Father Grigori, I cannot stand your absence for any longer. My life is sad and empty without you, my consoler and master. Alexei has had a new relapse. Do not worry for Kokotzeff, he will get what he deserves. Forgive me if I doubted. Please come back for me and for Alexei's life." Rasputin's answer to the Czarina was not late: "God has listened to your prayers and your tears. Do not be sad, your son will survive, provided the doctors stop tormenting him." The Empress showed the cablegram to the Czar and he sent the doctors away. Immediately the son's condition improved and the fever disappeared. Nobody could give a scientific explanation for this; it was probably another miracle.

On that occasion the Czar said to the Court, "The defamers of Rasputin are idiots. I know him well." After Rasputin returned, he was again offered money by Kokotzeff (this time 300,000 rubles) to leave Court. An indignant Rasputin replied, "You should have learned by now that I cannot be bought. I only obey God's voice and no force on earth can make me do things against his orders." Rasputin was aware that the people from his country, the farmers, the muzhiks of Russia, stood on his side. He did a lot for them. He particularly tried, with all his power, to avoid war, because this would have meant the killing of a great number of these people, these farmers, these muzhiks. Grigori said to the Generals, "War offends God, and insults the people." In May 1914 Rasputin went back to Siberia. They did not listen to his advice and Russia entered war. The 29th day of June 1914 was a terrible date for the Imperial family. The envious and vindictive monk Yliodor partially succeeded in the plan that tormented him for years. Kionja, one of his disciples, a violent and bigoted woman, was able to hit Rasputin in the stomach with a sharpened knife, while pretending to present a petition. Then she ran away screaming that she killed the Devil.

Rasputin was not ready to die and recovered after several days in the hospital. Yliodor disappeared into a foreign country and Kionja ended in Siberia. Grigori forgave them, but Yliodor continued to plot against Rasputin to obtain the “vendetta” which was now so close. The 31st day of July 1914 the Czar, influenced by the Generals and not listening to Rasputin, decide to declare war against Germany. General mobilization took place. In September, Rasputin returned to St. Petersburg and was seen to be silent, immersed in tragic thoughts. The Czar was pleased with the initial positive news from the war front. Rasputin asked him, “Little Father, how many Russians have died so far?” The Czar admitted that it was a remarkable number, but that the Austrians suffered an even higher death toll. Rasputin then said, “They are all sons of God, and these figures make me very sad. Even if we are doing well from a military point of view, I am afraid that the social situation is going to change.” Stubbornly, Rasputin continued his fight against the war.

Many things were rapidly changing. Many high officials disappeared. In 1916 he was able to entertain secret negotiations in Stockholm to sign a separate peace treaty with Germany, but was accused of treason by a group of aristocrats. The Home Office Minister, Protopopov, and Prime Minister Strumer were also accused of being secret agents in the service of Germany, because they were friends of Rasputin.

In this particularly tragic situation the plots and the maneuvers for power increased and went out of control. In 1916, during the course of the war, an insurrection against the Czar developed in Central Asia. The repression, as usual, was fast and cruel, and several poor farmers were killed. Among the military powers, a rumor started that Rasputin told the Czar that Russia would have lost the war if they had sent the “second class” of Army (the one the Czar’s son belonged to) to the front. This was untrue. What really happened was that in 1914, at the beginning of the war, the majority of soldiers came from the farms. They had been literally taken by force from their lands, with the threat of being court martialled if they refused. Consequently the troop's morale was very low, and the lack of motivation was not conducive to battle. Because of his political intrigues, Rasputin lost the friendship of the most powerful people in the Court. Among them Prince Yusupov, the Grand Duke Dimitri Pavlovic, a member of the Duma Purishko.

They were the plotters that, in order to avoid a catastrophe and probably also to keep their prestige in the Court, organized Rasputin's assassination. It was a useless murder, because the tragedy that was overtaking Russia could not be stopped. The many prophecies of Rasputin were truthful and his words to the Czarina sounded like a premonition: "If you separate from me, in less than six months you will lose throne and life. I have terrible nightmares and through them I see my future. I will die very soon, amidst terrible suffering, and you, little mother, will lose your crown and will be massacred with the rest of your family." Rasputin's enemies were looking for the killers who could remove the unwanted starets. They found them not among the poor farmers, who were Rasputin's allies, but in the vain and useless relatives of the Czar.

The "execution" committee was composed of five members: the Grand Duke Dimitri; Prince Felix Yusupov, the pale artist with a morbid soul; the Duma member Purishkovich, the military surgeon; the lieutenant Suchotin; and the Polish Doctor Lasovert, the Yusupov family's medical doctor. Grand Duke Nicholas stayed prudently covered behind the scenes. The Yusupov family was one of the richest of Russia. Felix married Grand Duchess Irina, the Czar's niece.

The prince had a feminine soprano voice and loved to play the guitar and dress in extravagant disguise. He did not enjoy a good reputation, and Rasputin used to call him "the little weak sinner." Anna Wyrubova, who knew him very well, advised Rasputin to stay away from him: "Felix is a coward, a braggart, a vile traitor in search of unusual sensations." Once in a St. Petersburg theatre he played a soprano role, dressed like a woman, and nobody, not even the director, realized it. "He likes to dress as a woman so he can attract the attention of men.” Yusupov’s father considered his son to be a canaille (a French word for proletarian) and thought that his place was in Siberia among the convicts.

Rasputin, talking to the State minister Chwostoff and his vice minister Beletzki, confided to them, “It is true that the little father and the little mother do what I want. It is true that I am the Government of Russia. But after my death the Czar will lose his crown and all of Russia will change radically.”

In the meantime the political situation had become even more serious. The enemy had invaded Poland, the Russian army was disorganized and was resisting only thanks to its superior number, thanks to the bastion of its human bodies. Rumania was occupied by Austrian troops. At home the revolution fomented. Although still underground, a movement of rebellion was pervading all social classes and was already evident in the largest cities like Moscow. Russia’s entry into the war had surprised and exasperated Lenin. Surprised because he had incorrectly believed that all European socialist parties would have opposed war. Indignation because he, like Rasputin, considered war a manifestation of economic imperialism and therefore against the proletariat’s interest. He took advantage of the situation and had the ability to transform the “imperialistic war” into the “socialist revolution.” The Russian people, armed by the bourgeoisie to protect the capitalistic power, must fight against them to gain the leadership. Lenin became more optimistic with the war’s development. He understood that Russia would have been in such difficulties as to provoke an uprising of the people against its government. He was right. He took all possible advantages from the war and from Germany, which had an interest in helping the enemies of the Russian power and army; i.e. the Russian Bolsheviks. The well-known Doctor Parvus, a German-Russian socialist, author of economic analysis, worked for a while for the Bolshevik party and then in the service of Germany. A good organizer and theoretician, he was a friend of Lenin and helped him to travel through Germany in 1917 and reach St. Petersburg without being stopped by the German authorities. It is said that Lenin and Parvus maintained written communications with Rasputin in the hope of organizing the transformation from a capitalistic war to a war of the classes. In reality there is no evidence of such contacts.

The plot against Rasputin continued its development. The young Felix met Grigori in the house of mutual friends, Jiona and Olga. The handsome and feminine prince was singing a delicate song and Rasputin was fascinated by the music and the gypsy guitar. This time Rasputin's instinct and intuition failed. He did not realize that such an elegant and refined young person could be a vile traitor. Felix felt that Rasputin liked him and took advantage of it. Grigori called him "his little young friend," and Felix for many months continued to lie and pretend that Rasputin was his friend. The pressuring of Yliodor set the final date. It was the 16th day of December 1916, according to the Russian calendar, the 30th according to the Gregorian calendar.

Rasputin, in his home at 68 Gorokowaia Street, was waiting in the late afternoon for his friend Felix Yusupov. Felix was going to take the starets to his palace at number 94 along the Moika. Felix told Rasputin that he was to meet his beautiful wife Irina, who was really in Krimea. The loyal Katja with Matrjona, the elder daughter of Rasputin, had prepared the greensilk tunic, embroidered with drawings representing dragons in red and black. The shining smooth boots and the black galoshes (the dress code now loved by Rasputin). Everything was ready when the new Home Office Minister arrived, out of breath and extremely worried, to tell him that there were rumors that his life was in danger. Grigori was not worried and told him to go back to his office. In addition his secretary, Simanovic, informed Grigori that he was in danger, but Rasputin replied, "We will see who is the strongest." At 10.15 p.m. Felix arrived, wearing a smart fur. He kissed Rasputin, who told him, "My dear little friend, is this the kiss of Judah?" and Rasputin's eyes looked very firmly at Felix's. "I have just spoken to Protopopov, who advised me not to leave home. Apparently somebody is trying to kill me, and if you want I can give you the details." Yusupov remained speechless and extremely pale. Rasputin abruptly said, "Let's go, I am ready." Katja for the first time insisted that Rasputin stay. She had intuitively felt the danger. Rasputin was again very relaxed and calm, and kissed her and his daughter. This was very unusual and Katja's eyes were full of tears. Once in the Yusupov's mansion Rasputin was accommodated in a nicely furnished secluded area. From the window one could see the main salon of the palace, always crowded with important guests.

That evening the lights were on and the orchestra was playing. Everything was fake, the music and the noise of the guests. Rasputin asked who was in the palace and Felix replied, "These are my wife's friends. They will leave shortly." Rasputin was served Krimea wine and French champagne, hors d'oeuvres and canapés.

Beautiful fresh flowers decorated the room. The food was poisoned and the wine drugged. The poison and drug came from the hospital doctor, Obukoff, friend of Prince Felix. There was enough cyanide to kill ten men. But Grigori looked fine, and Felix was nervous. "Father Grigori, how do you feel?" he asked. Rasputin replied, "My mouth has a bitter flavor. Give me more wine." Rasputin drunk and ate voraciously, and then asked Felix to play the guitar for him. Felix was singing an old folk song and Grigori seemed absent. His behavior was unnatural, as he was usually very attentive. He looked as if distracted with a sort of vacant air. Was he listening to Felix, or to his internal premonitions? Certainly he was troubled and probably his magnetic power started to weaken. He was feeling a sense of fatigue, while he continued to drink that wine and eat that food.

Now the noise from the palace had stopped, but nothing was happening. Why? Why? Felix was wondering, shaken and scared. That poison should have finished Rasputin by now. At 2.30 a.m., Felix, now extremely nervous, heard noises coming from upstairs. Evidently his allies in the plot were becoming nervous too. So he asked Rasputin again, "Don't you feel well Grigori?" Rasputin poured some more wine and said with great fatigue, "My head is a little heavy and my stomach upset." That's all.

How could he be behaving like nothing happened? The poison mixed in the food and in the wine was enough to kill at least ten people. Yet Grigori was not showing any signs of poisoning, only a certain melancholy. Now Grigori started to look at Felix while he continued to drink very slowly his wine; it was an enigmatic look capable of destroying Felix's nerves. The time passed, and still nothing happened. Felix was feeling very tired and could not sing anymore. Only his fingers were caressing the guitar's strings. Then suddenly he said, "Look, Grigori, look at this beautiful Christ made in ivory, a work of the Italian Renaissance." Rasputin fixed stupefied on the artwork that the young man, with trembling hands, was showing him. His face now took on an expression of serenity and happiness. A few more minutes and the gun, this was in fact the Renaissance artwork, shot once, twice, three times. Rasputin's body fell on the floor, without a noise, contorting on the carpet. The young executioner, pale and trembling, was now looking at his victim. The great starets was at his feet, but Rasputin was not yet dead.

His eyes were changing color and took on a green light. The pain deformed his mouth, teeth closed, and blood, nearly black, and flowed out from a large wound in the left temple. Felix was fascinated by that glass-like look; those eyes that used to terrify him like a knife entering his brain, were now attracting him with even more power and terror. It was impossible to resist. and Felix, moved by an hypnotic force coming from Rasputin eyes, was obliged to kneel down to his body in a way that seemed a manifestation of respect. It was a question of seconds, and Rasputin's hands, like fangs, held his neck to strangle him. Felix screamed harshly, awakened from his half-hypnotic state and jumped back, crazed by terror. He took a heavy stick covered with iron and savagely hit several times the lifeless body of Rasputin. Felix's servant, who returned to the scene when he heard the noise, witnessed the terrible outburst and the useless ferocity.

After a while the plotters met in the room realizing that, finally, the attempt to kill Rasputin had succeeded. To divert the policemen of the Ochrana, Dimitri and Lasovert put Rasputin's garments on lieutenant Suchotin and went by car to the starets' house. Yusupov stayed with Putishkovich in the room with the body. After all, the devil might still be alive. The representative of the Duma moved close to Rasputin's body and shook it. To his astonishment the left eyelid started to shrink spasmodically. His eyes opened and a greenish light glimmered in the dark of the room. The two men had a terrible and obsessive feeling. Rasputin was again able to move. On all fours he reached the stairs and the door looking into the garden. With his remaining strength he opened the door, pulling it desperately. Purishkovich followed him and shot three more times. A policeman called from the outside, "Your excellence, we heard a shooting," and Felix responded quickly, "Don't worry, it is nothing. One of my guests is just shooting in the air." Rasputin's body was brought back into the room, and covered with a blanket. After a while the Grand Duke's car returned, bringing also the lieutenant and the doctor. They load up the body, folding its legs and arms, and went in the direction of the Petroski Bridge on the Neva. The body of Rasputin was thrown into the icy waters.

One of Rasputin's black galoshes was found on the bridge. After a long and distressed search, the disfigured body of the starets was recovered from the river. The body could not reach the Gulf of Finland, as hoped by the killers, since the glacier did block it. The skull was smashed, the right eye came out and was swinging attached only by a ligament. A quantity of water was found in the stomach, and one hand was freed from the ropes, indicating that Rasputin, still alive when he was thrown in the river, had desperately tried to save himself.

The funeral of the starets, at State's expense and with official protocol, took place the 21st day of December. The Court ordered a day of mourning. Father Teophan celebrated the last services and the burial was in the park of Zarskoje Selo. The Imperial family attended the ceremony, according to the rituals of the Orthodox Church. The Czarina deposited a sacred image in the tomb of Rasputin. On the back she wrote, "My loved and sublime martyr, please give me your blessing so that I can be escorted by you for the remainder of my sad life on Earth. Remember us in your prayers from Heaven. Alexandra." The State Police investigated and discovered the truth, but the power of the families Yussupov and Dimitri was a great deterrent to justice. The participation in the murder of two such important members of the noble class created embarrassment to the Ochrana, made the investigation very awkward and gave strength to the plotters. The Czarina used to say that Rasputin was the intermediary between her, the Czar and God. But in this occasion she could not influence her husband who, threatened also by the difficult political and social situation, did not find the strength to obtain justice. The plotters received a mild and short exile in their rich summer residences. After a certain time, the Czar finally had the courage to condemn the murder, at least with words: "I, Nicholas the Second, am ashamed to face Great Russia for the murder of Grigori Rasputin, caused by the hands of people belonging to my family."

But history moved on, and the prophecies of Rasputin became inexorably true. "When I will not be here to protect you, you will lose your son, your throne, your life. But even worse will be my enemies' fate. I know that I will die among terrible pain, but, even if the wind tries to disperse my ashes, I will still do miracles from the tomb. Thanks to my prayers, sick people will recover and sterile women will birth children." This, at least in part, was true. The mourning for Rasputin's death was not yet over, and his enemy Yliodor, not satisfied with Rasputin's death, was still plotting to throw mud on his memory. He continued to maneuver to have bad press and gossiping to darken Rasputin's image. This only succeeded in increasing the already tense situation in Russia. On the night of the 22nd day of March 1917, the same day that the Czar abdicated, a group of drunken soldiers profaned Rasputin's tomb, devastated the sepulchre and removed Rasputin's corpse to take it to the forest of Pargalowo. There other soldiers built a funeral pyre. Rasputin's corpse, already half-putrefied, was covered with petroleum and cremated high on the funeral pyre. The fire lasted more than six hours until dawn. Hundreds of muzhiks, arriving from the nearer lands, witnessed in awe this macabre ceremony, so similar to the witch's sacrifices of the Inquisition.

Here was the man, the muzhik, the starets. Here was the friend of the Czar and the Czarina, sent by God, who had healed the sick, who had helped the poor, who always had had a word of love for those in need.

When the soldiers buried the ashes under the snow, those hundreds of peasants cross themselves in respect for the man that came from their land and was one of them, a son of the land where they were born, suffered, and where they would for many years to come.

On the 13th day of August 1917, the Imperial family was directed, by the forces of history, to the district of Tobolsk in Siberia, the birthplace of Rasputin. Little Alexei, the innocent friend of the starets, was happy because he hoped he would finally meet some of those fascinating personalities Rasputin told him about. Maybe he would also succeed in talking to the animals, the horses that were the best friends of his friend Grigori. Nicholas Romanov and Alexandra of Assia were headed towards the end of their lives. In vain they hoped to see in the vast steppe the image of the man that helped them so many times in the past. The Imperial family was chained and imprisoned to wait for the execution on the 16th of July 1918. Their prison was a poor house in Ekaterinburh, a small city not far away from Rasputin's birthplace. So the prophecies of Rasputin were becoming fulfilled.

Rasputin had three children: Dimitri, who was tragically and mysteriously killed; Varvara, the daughter who died by starvation together with her mother; and Maria the second daughter, still alive (Note: at the time this book was originally written, in 1960). Maria is in possession of the spiritual will of her father. It says, "My beloved, a tragedy is coming. The face of Our Saint Mother is darkened. Her spirit is troubled. The divine rage is going to be terrible. Where can I hide? It is written: be awake, as you don't know the hour or the day. There will be blood and tears. I know that my life is ending. God knows the way of our sufferance. The deaths are going to be thousands and thousands. Brother will kill brother. The earth will shake. Famine and plague will arrive. Pray for your salvation. Thanks to Our Savior and to his Mother. Grigori."

To complete the narration of Rasputin's life it is of interest to return to a woman who was important in his destiny: Elisalex. In a document she wrote on Rasputin she said: "Grigori had a strong prophetic gift, but this did not make him happy at all. All his prophecies had something tragic: the destiny of the Imperial family, the war, the revolution. I had been a Rasputinitzky and I don't regret that. In his eyes shone a special light, called by his admirers 'religious fervor.' He had an extraordinary physical strength. He was violent and brutal, but also kind and soft. He was a religious satyr, I a pagan nymph. The two extremes touch each other. My story is also the story of Russia. I will be described as liberated woman, which is probably true. But they will have to report also that all important decisions regarding Russia were decided first by Rasputin and my friends in my home. Then they were passed to the Czarina who officially approved them. Rasputin had a great power over the Imperial family, but I was behind him. I will never forget Rasputin's eyes. They were like the windows of his soul, and from those windows one could see his entire world. The vast land of his country, the flowers of the tundra, the shining of the winter snow, the splendor of nature and the eternal seduction of the flesh and of carnal love."

Many books, articles, and even movies have told the history of Rasputin. He has been described in many different ways: an impostor, a charlatan, a drunkard, a saint. In the history of "divination" we often find controversial personalities were good and bad, often taken to extremes, all mixed together. We believe that in the "Oracle" Rasputin has given us the best part of his personality. The rest belongs to one of the more complex periods of European History.

HOW TO USE THE ORACLE OF RASPUTIN

1. Keep diligently the three Talismans/Amulets. Do not fold them. Do not write on them.
2. The relation between the user and the Oracle is “personal and confidential.”
3. Look at the Questions listed at the pages 63-66 of the Oracle and choose the one you are really interested in.
4. Shuffle the three Talismans/Amulets without looking at them. Repeat mentally, with your eyes closed, your question for at least nine times. This is a simple operation, but requires concentration.
5. After you have repeated the question for at least nine times, draw one Talisman/Amulet and take note of the “element” represented in the Talisman/Amulet (AIR—FIRE—WATER).
6. Put back the Talisman/Amulet with the other two and repeat the operation two more times exactly in the same way. The result will be a combination of the three elements (i.e. AIR—AIR—FIRE or FIRE—WATER—AIR, and so on). There are 27 possible combinations.
7. Read in the Table of Responses on the page corresponding to the required question, the response of the Oracle appearing under the chosen combination.
8. For example, if the chosen combination is AIR—FIRE—WATER the correct response will appear in the same order AIR—FIRE—WATER on the list of the responses.
9. Keep in mind that all questions are numbered and the responses are reported under the same number.
10. The first response is the correct one. If the response is repeated twice on the same day it is always the first response that counts.
11. Given the particular nature of the Oracle, and in view to obtain serious and pertinent responses, it is advisable not to use the Oracle as a game and to ask appropriate questions.

WATER AIR AIR	Once again the stars will be on your side. Do not worry.
AIR FIRE FIRE	No fear. Your nose is typical of an old fox, and will not betray you.

AIR AIR AIR

Do not hold illusions in vain. This is going to be impossible on this Earth.

RESPONSES TO QUESTION #55

Do my relatives love me, and are they sincere?

FIRE FIRE FIRE

No illusions. The icy Siberian wind is like the look of their eyes.

FIRE FIRE WATER

Their sentiments are much better than you think. Reciprocate them in the same way.

FIRE FIRE AIR

They love you and they are sincere in their own way. Do not forget that each person has his own character.

FIRE WATER FIRE

You reap what you have sown. Look at the patient work of the good peasant.

They have both love and sincerity for you. The problem is the lack of mutual understanding.

FIRE WATER AIR

Do not worry. When and if you need it, they will show the strength of their good feeling toward you.

FIRE AIR FIRE

The fireplace needs wood to make a good flame. Try to be the well-seasoned wood.

FIRE AIR WATER

No doubts. Wait patiently and you will touch with your hand the nature of their good feelings.

FIRE AIR AIR

There still is certain confusion in their heart. They still have to learn to know you well.

WATER FIRE FIRE

Somebody who is hostile to you, has put doubts in their minds. Wait, as time will be on your side.

WATER FIRE WATER	Be nice with them and particularly do not discriminate. We all have our own pride.
WATER FIRE AIR	Do not torment yourself. The feelings in your regard are sincere and benign.
WATER WATER FIRE	Sit down around the table with a bottle of good wine. Let's talk and drink. The bad feelings will disappear.
WATER WATER WATER	Certainly not. They envy you and hope you will fail socially as well as financially.
WATER WATER AIR	You are doing very little to improve your relationship. Try to modify your attitude first.
WATER AIR FIRE	Why all these doubts? They have shown in more than one occasion the value of their good sentiments.
WATER AIR WATER	They do not have a common agreement in your regard. This is partially your fault. Try to remedy this with improved behavior.
WATER AIR AIR	They are afraid of your character, and this slows down the strength of their feelings.
AIR FIRE FIRE	They are a little invading and meddlesome, but they really love you and are very sincere.
AIR FIRE WATER	Your question is out of place. Don't you see that you are at the center of their attention?
AIR FIRE AIR	Do not blame them. You are a bad merchant, because you are using two weighing systems at the same

AIR WATER FIRE	time. They love you and are sincere. They are prepared to sacrifice themselves to help you.
AIR WATER WATER	Visit them more often. They also need to know that you are being sincere and in love with them.
AIR WATER AIR	Be more respectful in their regard and they will show more clearly their sincere and good sentiments.

AIR AIR AIR	They are not sincere and do not love you. This is just the reciprocal feeling that you have for them.

FIRE WATER FIRE	Show your personality. You have good qualities and you need to make sure than they are appreciated.

FIRE WATER WATER	Be content with the little expected. You know very well that you cannot have more.

FIRE AIR FIRE	You will find what you are looking for, but your pride will be hurt and you will suffer badly.
FIRE AIR WATER	Your luck is moving at a very slow speed, but it is moving. Be patient and the result will arrive.
FIRE AIR AIR	Your career is a squeezed lemon, but you are clever and will be capable of obtaining a few more drops.
WATER FIRE FIRE	You will obtain the desired promotion, but the financial improvement will disappoint you.
WATER FIRE WATER	You will obtain improvement and promotion through good and sincere friends.
WATER FIRE AIR	Do not worry. You will have to wait a few months but you will then get what you are waiting for.
WATER WATER FIRE	You will get what you are hoping for. Move fast, using the good relationships that can help you.
WATER WATER WATER	Absolutely not. You have too many enemies and this is working against you.
WATER WATER AIR	Continue to work and fight. Your success will come after a few more obstacles.
WATER AIR FIRE	The time is not ripe yet, but you are on the good road for improving and being promoted.

WATER AIR WATER	You will make it. Keep your projects to yourself and do not share them with your colleagues.
WATER AIR AIR	You will have what you desire. Unfortunately your character will take away the pleasure of enjoying it.
AIR FIRE FIRE	Certainly, using the method that you know so well: put oil on the wheels.

AIR AIR FIRE	Certainly and a member of your family will be of great help.
AIR AIR WATER	You are more "thinking" than "acting." Try to move in the opposite way.
AIR AIR AIR	No, it is not possible. Don't you see that your tree is not bearing any fruits.

RESPONSES TO QUESTION #57

Should I change my job or business?

FIRE FIRE FIRE	No. It will be a great mistake and a major deception without remedy.
FIRE FIRE WATER	Think well. Change your system of work and bring in new and useful solutions.
FIRE FIRE AIR	This is certainly a good idea, but I suggest you to move to a foreign country.
FIRE WATER FIRE	You might, on condition of great sacrifices, very tough to face.
FIRE WATER WATER	Yes on one condition: change your place of residence.
FIRE WATER AIR	Yes. Decide fast and take the one that you did not want to do before.
FIRE AIR FIRE	It will be a useless risk. Instead work with more passion and motivation on your present job.
FIRE AIR WATER	Yes, follow your instinct. It will be difficult at the beginning but the results will arrive.
FIRE AIR AIR	Yes. Remember only to do what you are capable of doing well.
WATER FIRE FIRE	It is too early. First look at how certain aspects of your present business are developing.
WATER FIRE WATER	I do not see the advantages. Besides, this is the kind of activity you are really good at.
WATER FIRE AIR	You can certainly do that one day. But now it is not the right time.
WATER WATER FIRE	Why this question? You know very well that it is impossible and also consider that you are entering the evening of your life.

WATER WATER WATER	Absolutely not. In a few years you will be again in the same situation.
WATER WATER AIR	Why change? It's not going to be easy and you do not seem to have the required qualities.
WATER AIR FIRE	You can do it. Only be careful not to make the same mistake.
WATER AIR WATER	For certain reasons it will be a good idea. But do not underestimate the negative impact.
WATER AIR AIR	Your nature is very difficult to be satisfied. Why do you want to change? Try instead to modify your expectations.
AIR FIRE FIRE	I do not see how, unless you are prepared to destroy your family.
AIR FIRE WATER	Yes, but keep in mind that big organizations are not made for you.
AIR FIRE AIR	It will require a great effort, that neither your physical nor your psychological nature can bear.
AIR WATER FIRE	Certainly, but keep in mind that you will earn only thanks for hard work and efforts.
AIR WATER WATER	Think well. The water of the Great River overflows, but then returns in its banks and continues to flow as before.
AIR WATER AIR	Be tranquil and content with yourself. Your stars are good, but not outstanding.
AIR AIR FIRE	Why don't you change instead the type of people gravitating to you?
AIR AIR WATER	You are facing a crossroad. One road is good and the other bad, and you know it.

AIR AIR AIR

Why so much trouble? You will not be happy, even if you do it. The real problem is your own character.

Leopoldo Benassi, Prof. Manteia (1908-1975)

Leopoldo Benassi, who went by the pen name “Manteia,” was an Italian who lived in Rome. Manteia dedicated his life to the study of occultism and divination, always with the intention of writing about the life of famous clairvoyants.

He published several successful books on such fascinating subjects as the Prophecies of Nostradamus, the Life of Cagliostro and The Oracle of Rasputin.

His most revered book, The Oracle of Rasputin is an ancient script attributed to the controversial Russian clairvoyant Rasputin and was discovered by Manteia in a rare encounter with a mysterious gentleman. Manteia deciphered the text written in Old Russian and translated it into Italian.

Manteia was a passionate chiromancer and an accredited member of Esoteric Academies and Universities, and was determined to demonstrate that chiromancy is a science fighting against those rascals that deceived the profession.

He was much respected and admired, and was always referred to as a chirosofer from the Greek kheir, hand and sofós, sapient.
